COVID-normal conditions require everyone to maintain hygiene as a priority. Public health recommendations, such as working from home, have resulted in fewer vehicles on the streets, more people walking and cycling, and some streets closures. During this time an increase in speeding vehicles, and mental illness reports of anxiety and depression, has been recorded.

Driving looks different now.

Health recommendations and mobility patterns are changing, cities are repurposing sections of the street network.

Still safety is the priority.
